DRESDEN, Germany – As the flood waters from the rain-swollen Elbe River filled the basement floors of Dresden's famed Zwinger Palace and the nearby Albertinum Museum, head of national art collections Martin Roth breathed a sigh of relief that 15,000 masterpieces previously stored there were safe upstairs.

Roth expressed gratitude to the 200 museum workers, soldiers, and volunteers who worked Thursday and Friday nights to save the city's cultural heritage. About 4,000 paintings stored in the basement of the eighteenth-century palace were brought upstairs to safety, while in the Albertinum, workers carried 11,000 statues up to the first and second floors.

"It was really close," said Roth as he stood among crowded rows of mixed sculptures, Greek statues right alongside Egyptian tablets, all now out of harm's way. As the waters churned toward Dresden this week, Roth rushed to mobilize the rescue operation. Miraculously, not a single statue was dropped nor a painting torn.

"When the last painting had been removed, we went upstairs to sit in my office," Roth said. "Then someone came in and said, 'The water is beginning to pour in.'"

Q. When Roth heard the words, "The water is beginning to pour in," what would have been his most logical response?

- A. "Save the Greek statues first!"
- B. "Don't panic! We'll come up with a plan soon."
